Overview

Do you need skills to meet the changing world of work?

Research has proven that our jobs and workplaces are, and will continue to transform and evolve, so how can you ensure that you are competitive for skills of the future?

You need a set of transferrable skills.

People can no longer rely on technical skills 'they need a set of transferrable skills' (Foundation for Young Australians 2017).

ET Australia's training program 'Skills for the Changing World of Work' will provide you with;

All of the above will be covered in ET Australia’s Skills for the Changing World of Work training program. Many of these skills can’t be learnt, practiced or applied via online learning which is where the classroom provides the ideal environment for you to develop and gain the skills employers are looking for.

Not only will you develop employability skills highly valued by employers but you will leave the program with:

- A personalised and professional resume
- Interview skills that will be gained via mock interviews
- A portfolio of work that you can showcase to an employer
- An idea of the career direction you want to follow, and
- An accredited nationally recognised qualification (upon successful completion)

Our past students were asked to identify the ‘Two most important things learned during training’ and below are some of the responses;

- Planning and organising (Renaë)
- Email writing, eye for detail (Brooke)
- Time management skills, how to handle interviews (Oren)
- How to use a computer in many ways (I barely knew how to), how to deal well with customers and co-workers (Patricia)
- How to use programs effectively and working efficiently with different tasks (John)
- Communication skills, confidence (Amelia)
- How to write a good cover letter and resume, computer skills (Jazmin)
- More confidence in myself, how to add more skills to my resume (Robyne)
- Microsoft programs, organisational skills (Samantha)

You can see how the above aligns to the top ten employability skills employers are looking for.

It doesn't matter what career path you are looking to go down, the transferrable skills you will learn during the program will be valued by all employers, technical skills are something that can be learnt on the job.

The training is delivered in a simulated work environment to prepare you to apply your skills in a real work environment.

The structure of this program provides all students with a supportive learning environment and is ideal for anyone who likes a more personalised approach to training. With classroom based training, students have their classmates, the Trainer and Training Officer to support and help them with their various learning needs. The location for the training in the Young Parents' Hub provides additional wrap around services that are available to all students.
